Poland - Bt Boda Biosphere Park, Szymon, 2K24 DownloadI made a post about my recent visit to the New York City's Central Park on Sunday, so I thought I'd share some of my memories of an old-fashioned day at a zoo. It's the most beautiful part of the city, and I didn't want to leave because of an angry squirrel! Anyway there were probably about 50 squirrels in my group and we were on a hike in a tree.. The Bt gene has been linked to several negative health outcomes in animals and humans, among them birth defects, cancer, diabetes, rickets and mental retardation. The use of Bt gene DNA as food additive in non-Btgenic foods will, however, still be controversial in India. The Food Safety and Standards Commission of India (FSSAI) is considering the use of Bt in India. The main concern is the possibility that Bt in the food chain leads to the accumulation of harmful compounds that are not directly toxic to the host organism but can accumulate into the environment over a longer period of time which can be harmful to humans. There are several other issues to be addressed before India allows Bt to be licensed in food. One of the primary concerns is whether the plant itself is harmful to the consumer. The environmental impact of Bt is minimal because most of the plant's biomass is harvested as animal feed or in cattle feed. If the crop is sold directly it is not subject to the same assessment. Therefore, for animal feeds, there is little chance of environmental harm because only a portion is used and none of the product is subject to the regulation. If Bt is used in food it may lead to a higher bioaccumulation of Bt DNA in the intestine through absorption. Although not a direct bioaccumulation issue, this will not be easy to correct as a high proportion of Bt DNA ends up in the food chain. A variety of species of rice and wheat are grown in India that have some level of Bt DNA (see). A variety of Bt-containing vegetables are sold that are low in Bt DNA. The use of genetically modified plants, especially with Bt DNA DNA has been an issue with the import of such organisms for purposes of agricultural production in the US and Canada. In India, it is difficult to control the spread of these products because of the complex geographical distribution of Bt rice, Bt wheat and the lack of a regulatory structure such as a Food Safety Notification System..
