All cutscenes are rendered in real-time graphics, making Halo 4 the first main series installment not to use pre-rendered cinematics.

The game starts off almost immediately following "". The Master Chief is adrift aboard Forward Unto Dawn, stranded in unknown space after sacrificing himself to destroy the Didact's ship Mantle's Approach at the end of "Forerunner". Cortana, Chief's artificial intelligence, informs him that a distress beacon is aufwachsen in a nearby star system. Chief and the crew of the "Dawn" then enter the star system and discover a ringworld orbiting an ancient Forerunner AI. As the AI emerges from slumber, it is revealed to be 343 Guilty Spark, whose "restoration" was engineered by an ancient Forerunner called the Ur-Didact. Guilty Spark reveals he plans on destroying humanity so that he can reunite himself with his physical form which still remains on Earth under UNSC control. The AI explains that he awoke after having been inactive for thousands of years. The Master Chief and the UNSC then travel to a shield world called Requiem, where they discover that the Didact is actually an old enemy of humanity named Forerunner commander-in-chief known as the Ur-Didact. The Didact plans to use a device called the Composer against humanity to force them into becoming Prometheans, his own army who lack free will. To this end, he seeks out the Composer's sister device, which is located on Earth. Having realized the Master Chief's importance in the Forerunners' plans, Guilty Spark locks him up in a Cryptum, a Forerunner stasis prison, while the Ur-Didact takes control over Requiem and prepares to attack Earth. Cortana activates a distress beacon and is picked up by the UNSC Infinity three years later. They travel to Requiem where they free the Master Chief from his Cryptum after defeating his incarnation of 343 Guilty Spark. The Chief and the crew of Infinity then pursue the Didact back to Earth, where he deploys his Composer and converts millions of New Phoenix's inhabitants into Prometheans.
